City Limits: The relationship between employment and minimum wage using mobile-device locations (Job Market Paper)

The last decade has seen noteworthy local policy decisions, especially a trend in the decentralization of wage determination. Considering that local policy changes are aimed at the local areas where boundaries are porous, there is a need for analyses that incorporate detailed and accurate geographic and time information. Using establishment locations and mobile-device location data, this study explores how the labor market responds to local minimum wage ordinances. I use the difference-in-differences approach to estimate the effect of variation in the minimum wage on the duration of visits at a location, which can be used as a proxy for employment hours. I find a decrease in employment hours when there is a proportionate increase in the local minimum wage and an increase in distance traveled from home with an increase in the minimum wage. The study further demonstrates that the local labor market, especially in the non-tradeable sector, is more responsive to changes in the local minimum wage than the state-bound minimum wage changes.
